

Body image issues are something I have never thought too much about. I did not consider myself to be someone with body image issues. The issues portrayed in the media often times deals with weight or looks, neither of which I ever had issues with. However, looking back on my past, I have struggled with body image issues in other ways.

Growing up, I never considered myself to be too different from other people. As a child, one is naïve and does not really have an opinion as to how people are different. Being a minority at school was something I became more aware of from K-12. Being different than other people, being treated differently, or bullied just because I was Asian, resulted in the first time I experienced body image issues. As a result of this, during middle school, I started to dislike how I looked. Not looks in terms of beauty or attraction, but my ethnicity and how I was Asian. I tried so hard to change how I look to make myself more "white" by wearing blue contacts and dyeing my hair. I thought by looking more like the majority, I could fit in more and change how people treated me.

Slowly as I moved on to high school and college, I have grown to love myself for who I am, became more confident, and am now proud of my ethnicity and background. Even though I was happy with how I looked, the issues did not stop there. Something that has always bothered me about the media and the body issues that they portrayed were always things that could be "fixed." If you are not happy with your weight you could lose or gain weight. Not happy with how you look? Wear some makeup. But what about chronic illnesses? What about other ways that your body could be different, but you just cannot change?

In 5th grade, I was diagnosed with having scoliosis. For people who do not know what that is, scoliosis is a chronic illness were your spine is rotated and curved. In extreme cases, surgery is needed where you have to have your spinal vertebrae's fused together, and have rods inserted to keep it straight. Otherwise, it could cause damage to other internal organs, furthering health issues. As for people (like me) that have moderate or non-severe conditions. the main issue that it would cause is back pain. But regardless of health issues, the one thing that always bothered me about having scoliosis, is how it deforms your body. Having a shoulder that's higher than another or a deformed torso, are things that I did not (and sometimes still to this day do not) like at all. Sure I know, because it is my body I notice it more, and people probably do not even notice unless I mention it or they pay close attention, but alas, they are things I cannot change (not without surgery anyway). So I guess it comes to the question, what do you do about body image issues you cannot fix? You learn to live with it I guess.

Still, whether body image issues stem from peers, parents, the media, or even yourself, it is also important to note several aspects. Aspects such as where body image issues come from, learning how to overcome them, and understanding how other variables have an influence on them. As for my parents, one thing that I have really appreciated my dad for doing is not allowing me to wear makeup until college. Because of it, I am more confident in how I look naturally and do not feel like I need to wear makeup in order to be happy with how I look or for other people, but rather as something for myself. Although, coming from an Asian household, looks were something that was usually correlated with helping your career or to find a better job.

On the other hand, my mom sometimes tries to coerce me into getting cosmetic surgeries to improve how I look. Personally, I would not get any procedures or body modifications unless it were health related, something that I would willingly change about myself cosmetically, or tattoos and piercings. Most recently, over winter break, I went to Taiwan for a couple weeks to visit family and celebrate the holidays. While I was there I got double eyelid surgery, for the second time in fact. Something that my mom has thought (and maybe other Asian parents too?) is that, since some Asians do not naturally have double eyelids, having them gives an overall more energetic appearance. Naturally, I had one monolid, and one double lid, it was not something I really cared about fixing, but at the same time, I did not mind either. The experience of the procedure itself was not pleasant in the slightest, given that I had to be awake for the whole thing. More traumatizing I would say (getting numbing shots in your eyelids hurts a lot). Other than having double eyelid surgery, I have also had my eyebrows tattooed a bit, for the same reasons of fixing imperfections. Even though on both occasions, I did not eagerly want to have these procedures done, I did not mind fixing these aspects about myself either, and am satisfied with the result. Other than that, I would not get any other cosmetic procedures of any sort, because I am happy with how I look.

Regardless of what body image issues you may have, and your decision to change them or not, at the end of the day what I think is the most important is being confident in yourself, and happy with your own body. Having a great personality or confidence often shows more character and is something people will notice more so than anything about how you look. While expressing yourself is something that can be fun, just remember to do it for yourself, and not for anyone else.

